Dear Jared:

Thanks for sending me the first five pages of the rough typeset of your newsletter. You are saying a lot of things that need to be said, but I anticipate that it will be very tough sledding. As you note in your cover letter, this is not material that people want to hear.

My general observation is that to accomplish something, you need an effector mechanism. By that, I mean some sort of organization that can actually pick a part of the problem and try to change it.

This in turn requires that a discrete, and hopefully realizable goal be chosen. It seems to me the abuses of affirmative action are the best and ripest target. One needs a suitable majorative. The one I like is affirmative racism. Then the whole thing must be couched in positive terms: One wants to be for something, rather than against. I would be glad to chat about all this if you would like.

I was puzzled not to see your name on the masthead. I am assuming you wrote the lead editorial. Is there some reason why you don't want to be listed?

Cordially,

John Tanton
